*Today's plaza—
the heart of Old Town—recreates the influences of 19th-century Mexican and American California.*

Old Town San Diego State Historic Park pays tribute to the cultural influences that make California special. Restored and reconstructed buildings in Old Town San Diego State Historic Park are now museums, shops, and restaurants that capture the energy of the community between 1821 and 1872. The central plaza is lined with buildings—some dating back to the 1820s—that offer a glimpse of the lifestyles of both ordinary residents and the most wealthy and influential.

Native Americans

The Kumeyaay lived on the San Diego River at a village they called Kosa'aay. For thousands of years, the people migrated between ocean and mountains—gathering seafood, acorns, and the necessities of life. Today a native plants garden marks part of the territory of that early settlement before the arrival of the Spaniards. At first, the Spanish settlers were welcomed by the Kumeyaay, but devastating challenges to traditional ways increasingly affected their lives. Kumeyaay culture proved resilient, and today many Kumeyaay proudly continue their traditions with modern adaptations.

A BRIEF HISTORY Spanish Settlement

In 1769 Spanish colonization of Alta California began in San Diego with construction of a military outpost called El Presidio Reál and of Mission San Diego de Alcalá, the first in a chain of 21 California missions. Mission Indians were used to cultivate crops, manufacture blankets and clothing, provide construction labor, as well as raise livestock.

Despite Spain's orders severely restricting trade with other countries, the Spanish padres exchanged otter skins, cowhides, and tallow for manufactured goods and luxury items from the United States, Europe, and China.

The Mexican Period

In 1822 a Mexican military command arrived in San Diego. Mexico had gained its independence from Spain the previous year.

The community changed under the new Mexican Republic. By this time, the mission with its labor force of the Kumeyaay had moved 6 miles inland. Whaling ships, otter-hunting crews, and trading vessels were a common sight to see off the coast.

Spanish soldiers began building residences below Presidio Hill in the early 1820s. Sun-dried adobe brick was their traditional building material, since wood was scarce. Soon five houses belonging to the Carrillo (and later Fitch), Ruiz, Ybañez, Serrano, and Marron families became the nucleus of the community. By 1825, the adobes formed a rough but orderly street pattern around an open plaza. Two of the finest structures, begun in 1827 and still standing today, belonged to José Antonio Estudillo and his brother-in-law, Juan Bandini.

Residents and visitors often enjoyed the customs and festivities of San Diego. The open plaza hosted fiestas, bullfights, games of chance, and other amusements that offered the opportunity for gambling.

The American Period

San Diego's Mexican era ended abruptly in 1846, when the United States declared war on Mexico. Initially the residents made little resistance to American occupation, but the situation eventually turned San Diego families against one another. Some remained loyal to Mexico, while others supported the United States. The town was occupied and won back several times—one major battle took place in nearby San Pasqual Valley. In 1846 U.S. Navy Commodore Robert F. Stockton captured San Diego. The war between Mexico and the United States ended in 1848 with the signing of the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, establishing a new boundary between the two countries.

James Marshall's gold discovery at Coloma in January 1848 lured adventurers from around the world. San Diego became an important stopover for miners en route to the gold fields, and immigrants crowded into available housing. Adobes were remodeled, and new structures were built. In 1851 prefabricated wood-frame buildings, brought by ship from New England around Cape Horn, were assembled in San Diego.

Following the Mexican-American War, California experienced a major political transformation—a new State Constitution written in 1849 and statehood in 1850. San Diego was incorporated as a city, and new American laws governed San Diego.

The decline of the military presence and the loss of business related to gold mining soon turned San Diego into a small, insular community. In the U.S. Census of 1860, only seven individuals identified themselves as merchants. Fire was a constant threat, and in the 1860s one misfortune after another struck. The storms of 1861–62 brought high tides and flooding. In May of 1862, a severe earthquake was followed by a smallpox epidemic. Several years of drought devastated Southern California's ranchos and its cattle industry.

In 1867 San Franciscan Alonzo Horton arrived in San Diego to begin building nearby New Town. Old Town enjoyed a slight resurgence in 1868 when the San Diego Union newspaper began publication there. From 1868 to 1874, Albert Seeley operated a thriving stagecoach line between San Diego and Los Angeles. Gold was discovered in nearby Julian in 1869, creating a need for supplies, services, and housing—a boon to San Diego's economy.

However, New Town quickly eclipsed the older settlement. Government offices moved to the new community, taking along much of Old Town's economic base. Hope for Old Town's revitalization died in the spring of 1872 when fire destroyed seven buildings, including the old courthouse.

Restoration

In 1907 John D. Spreckels—son of sugar magnate, Claus Spreckels—purchased the remains of La Casa de Estudillo and began the first efforts to revive Old Town.

Public fascination with Helen Hunt Jackson's romantic novel,

Ramona, led to the restoration of La Casa de Estudillo, advertised as "Ramona's Marriage Place." Its success in attracting visitors led to the restoration of other buildings, which helped renew interest in San Diego's Spanish and Mexican roots.

Auto touring brought still more visitors, and several buildings were constructed in the 1930s to enhance Old Town's appearance as a "Spanish village."

Old Town San Diego became a state historic park in 1968; the process of rediscovering and preserving the historic town began anew.

CLIMATE

San Diego's mild temperatures offer ideal visiting conditions year-round. With an average of only 10 inches of annual rainfall, temperatures vary from the mid-60s to the low 80s throughout the year. Coastal fog usually burns off in the afternoons.

LIVING HISTORY

The history of Old Town San Diego comes to life through its historic sites, museums, living history demonstrations, guided tours, and annual special events.

In addition to daily guided tours, Old Town San Diego hosts several free events every summer to celebrate the past.

Today's plaza remains the heart of Old Town, allowing visitors to discover the lives
